Narratives of Duty: How National Stories Shape Civic Duty in Asia

The way that democracy works relies a great deal on widespread civic duty in both ordinary and extraordinary times. What explains this sense of moral obligation to contribute to one's democracy? Why do some individuals feel it, but not others? I show that the answer lies not in some endowed aspect of culture or character, as commonly assumed, but in the national identity politics within a given democracy. National stories and the relational linkages they draw between a national people and the state in which they live powerfully shape the boundaries of civic obligation.
